

“A goal is not always meant to be reached, it often serves simply as something to aim at.”

This is a quote from Bruce Lee.

I chose this quote over another one of Bruce Lee's quote's that I live my life by; "I fear not the man who has practiced 10,000 kicks once, but the man who was practiced one kick 10,000 times." because it applies more to my current course in life. I have learned that setting goals is great, sometimes I don't always achieve them, but the fact that there was something there to aim for is what is most important. I always strive to do better and I never plateau for long. It's important for me to make goals, whether I can actually achieve them or not.

This applies to me currently because my goal two years ago was to go to full sail for music production. After thinking about my location and life situation, it seems as though it wouldn't be a logistically smart idea for me to pursue that. My current goal is a little bit more realistic. I feel as though both goals are in the same ballpark and the fact that I made them is what is most important. They are a target, I'm the bow AND the arrow. Eventually I'll hit something, even if it's not the target I originally chose.