I have done more than I realized in only the past 12 years. I went to art school for a year, then ended up leaving school and working as a mechanical integrity inspector and traveling all over the united states for three years. This gave me a lot of experience in travel, and professionalism in the workplace.

After that I decided to get married, start a family, and join the army. I was in the army for five years and traveled even more around the country and had the opportunity to live in South Korea for almost a year. While in the army I attended school and got an associates degree in general studies. I did some basic classes in order to refresh myself on college and get ready to go back to school full time.

Now I'm out of the army and living as a single parent with my son. I work full time doing mechanical inspections while attending school. I'm going to school for development in order to change my career yet again. I am constantly trying new things with my life and showing my son how to persevere when the odds are stacked against him.

After I'm finished school, I intend on searching for a decent job in development, or working freelance until a good opportunity arises. If everything works out well, I'll find a nice place to live and start a new chapter in my family's life. If no jobs come up, I will pursue development on my own and keep working on it in my free time. One of the things I count on is having a few career options so that I never have to worry about not having a job. I can always work and do what I enjoy on the side.
